CLASSIC AMERICAN DESIGN

Old American Golf Club began with the natural beauty of a prime landscape along the shores of Lake Lewisville. In keeping with the authenticity of the land, golf architects Tripp Davis and Justin Leonard crafted a course design that is representative of courses built in the early 1900's. From naturally formed bunkers and native grasses, to strategically designed holes that leverage varying wind conditions, the architects endeavored to create a course with exquisite balance. Old American possesses substance – a true golfer's course. Where strategic play is necessary. A course that intrigues the golfer with ever changing elements that create a different experience each time it is played.

SUSTAINABLE SETTING

Old American pays homage to the environment on which the course was built. Preservation of the wildlife and resources surrounding the course were innate to the design. Lake Lewisville makes a stunning appearance on several holes, providing challenging natural water hazards and a beautiful backdrop. The entire back 9 boasts all lakeside views that create a feeling of being one with nature. Careful attention was paid to the conservation and utilization of water throughout the course. Native grasses, trees and plants are used in order to preserve water as well as create intentional wildlife habitats.

THE UNIQUE NATURE OF THE BUNKERS

During the time of the "Golden Age of Golf Architecture", a sand bunker on a golf course was seen as a hazard and was not maintained as a "playing surface". Over time the perception of what a sand bunker is has changed.

The approach taken with the sand bunkers at Old American is part of creating the experience of playing the game as it was played in early days of American golf.
